

Hill, J.J.-Address

April 17, 1903

Alex. K. McClure to J. J. Hill.

"it is a sad commentary on the progress of this age that one who has done more to enrich this nation than any other individual since the foundation of our Government, is today confronted in the courts by the government itself, and as you well said in your address in New London yesterday, the great development and countless wealth you have made available to the people of the country is classed as a crime

General correspondence by date